About Coming of Age in Ancient Greece

The first traveling exhibition to focus on childhood in ancient Greece, this exhibition features more than 120 vases, terracotta figurines, statues and gravestones depicting the household environments within which children were raised, as well as activities from play to schooling, children's participation in religious rituals, the commemorative objects that marked an early death, their transition to adulthood, and images and stories of children in mythology. Actual objects used by ancient Greek children such as toys and baby feeders shed light on their care and upbringing.

One of the oldest and largest college museums in the country, the Hood Museum of Art houses a diverse collection of more than 65,000 works of art and art objects, with particular strengths in American painting and silver, European master paintings and prints, and African, Oceanic and contemporary art.
